Biography

Stephen Bennett is a patent litigator recognised for his ability to steer the right course in the toughest cases. Being trusted with the trickiest pharmaceutical cases for innovator clients means he has been able to push the boundaries around preliminary injunctions to stop infringing generic launch, changing the answer to the question: how far can a generic go before the court can stop it. His experience of pushing the most difficult cases includes those where they said it couldn't be done - zero term SPCs and paediatric extensions. They were wrong. In the tech sector, Stephen is known for litigating in some of the biggest patent disputes that Europe has seen. Those cases raise additional complications on issues such as FRAND, scope of injunctions, managing supplier information, co-ordinating litigation across multiple jurisdictions. Having litigated these issues several times over for different clients gives Stephen a particularly seasoned view that helps to anticipate the ways the case can develop and to deal with it.

Sometimes the case needs the law to move on for the client to win. This was true for the case that Stephen took to the Supreme Court for his client Verit. The case changed the law on patent infringement for the supply of consumable parts and allowed Verit to continue its business.
